Martyrdom Details and History

Omar Bin Nurul Abshar was born on January 2, 2002. He was the eldest son of Nurul Abshar and Ruby Akter. His parents dreamed of their son becoming an engineer, and he was raised with that goal in mind. He was talented, patriotic, and a son of Chittagong. He lived in Dhaka for his studies. His permanent address is in Popadia village, Union No. 6 of Boalkhali police station, which is an important part of his identity. He is identified as a proud martyr of the July Revolution, which is a mixture of pride and sorrow for his family. Omar's life is worthy of being remembered forever through his contribution to the country.

How He Embraced Martyrdom

On August 5th, the autocrat Hasina fled the country. But her killer forces were still indiscriminately killing in different parts of the country. In Uttara, Savar, and Jatrabari in Dhaka, the killer forces of the fallen government killed countless people. The anti-discrimination movement was just an occasion for a mass explosion against the Sheikh Hasina government.

The public was outraged by the long fifteen-sixteen years of misrule. The voice of the people had been silenced by disappearances, murders, and torture. They were forced to remain silent. The fire of uprising was suppressed by cases, attacks, and harassment. Yet it did not remain suppressed. Throughout the fifteen years, the general public has been seething with anger at various times in the movement. The government suppressed the non-violent movement on the streets by unleashing the police and party terrorists. Before the success of the Safe Road Movement and the Quota Movement, the protesters were forced to return home. They returned, but they did not stop.

In July '24, there was a volcanic eruption. As a result of this explosion, the students took to the streets. Along with them, their guardians. All professionals joined hands and took to the streets. The students' anti-quota movement turned from an anti-discrimination movement into anti-government movement. The government uses violence. The protesters remain vocal in the movement with empty hands.

Curfew is imposed in the country. All educational institutions and all government and private offices and factories are closed down. A state of emergency is in place in the country. The students' campuses are closed. Many of them went to their respective homes.

Omar Bin Nurul Abshar stays in Dhaka, defying his family's orders. He remains active in the movement. He was a patriotic, conscious citizen. He regularly participated in the movement. They are victorious in the movement. The defeated fascist flees. A wave of joy sweeps across the country. The protest march turns into a victory procession. Those who were in Dhaka surrounded the Ganobhaban of the fallen government. The people of Dhaka celebrate. Omar and others are also jubilant. They hold a victory procession. Suddenly, a dark shadow of sorrow descends on the victory procession.

The killer police of the fallen government suddenly attack the procession. Bodies begin to fall from the unarmed crowd. It was almost 4:30 in the afternoon. Omar was still live streaming. Suddenly, he was hit by a police bullet. He immediately collapsed. His companions were desperate to rescue him. He died there due to excessive bleeding. It is believed that the time was then 5 pm. On the day of victory, Omar Bin Nurul Abshar embraced martyrdom in the victory procession. When he was taken to his village home, Omar Bin Nurul Abshar was laid to rest forever in his own village.
